Attorney for Defendant
Carlos Saavedra Vasquez

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff, v. CARLOS SAAVEDRA VASQUEZ, Defendant.	Case No. 08CR0302-JLS REPLY AND OPPOSITION TO MOTION FOR VIDEOTAPED DEPOSITION AND VOLUNTARY DEPORTATION OF MATERIAL WITNESS Date: February 22, 2008 Time: 10:00 a.m. Place: Magistrate Judge Lewis

I.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On February 7, 2008, the attorney for material witness Nuria Christina Ramirez filed a motion to compel a videotaped deposition because of an inability to obtain the witness' release from custody on bond. Counsel for the material witness, Nuria Christina Ramirez, asserts that although the material witness would be admitted to a bond in this criminal case, she will not be granted an Immigration Bond authorizing her release from the custody of the Department of Homeland Security because she is from El Salvador. There is no declaration from the material witness setting forth any hardship to her remaining within the United States as a witness pending the resolution of the above-captioned criminal case.

Defense counsel has not yet attempted to meet and interview any of the three material witnesses up to the date of the filing of this motion because we do not have complete discovery, have not yet conducted any meaningful defense investigation, and have not yet formulated a theory of the defense complete and sufficient enough to conduct a meaningful interview of the witnesses.

Information provided in the factual statement in support of the complaint indicates that of the three identified material witnesses, only one, Nuria Christina Ramirez, is a citizen of El Salvador, illegally in the United States. The other two witnesses, Salvador Ramirez Olivera and Rosalio Olivera Vasquez, both identified themselves as citizens of Mexico, illegally in the United States. According to their counsel, those witnesses have been released on bond. The motion only concerns witness Nuria Christina Ramirez. There is no information at all in the record as to the reasons for the witnesses' illegal entry into the United States nor the potential hardships caused by their detention as material witnesses. There is no information in the record concerning the number of prior entries or attempted illegal entries on the part of witness Nuria Christina Ramirez.

II.

THE MOTION FOR MATERIAL WITNESS DEPOSITIONS SHOULD BE DENIED BECAUSE SUCH DEPOSITIONS WOULD VIOLATE THE ACCUSED'S SIXTH AMENDMENT RIGHT TO CONFRONTATION, THE MOTION IS INAPPROPRIATELY PREMATURE, AND THERE HAS BEEN NO SHOWING OF WITNESS UNAVAILABILITY

Title 18, United States Code § 3144 governs the detention of individuals who may give testimony material to a criminal proceeding. This section provides that where the witness is not able to meet the conditions of the bond set by the court and is detained, the court may order the deposition of the witness where (1) deposition may secure the testimony of the witness and (2) further detention is not necessary to prevent a failure of justice. 18 U.S.C. § 3144. In this case, the material witness has moved for a videotape deposition pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3144. Although depositions might secure her testimony, this Court should order the witness' continued detention in order to protect the rights of the accused, or in the alternative, modify the conditions of release so that the material witness can remain in the United States, at liberty and on bond, until this case is resolved. The failure of this Court to so order would result in a failure of justice on several fronts.

A. The Deposition of Material Witnesses Would Violate the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment.

Depositions in criminal cases are generally disfavored for several reasons, including the threat they pose to the defendant's Sixth Amendment confrontation rights. United States v. Drougal, 1 F.3d 1546, 1551-52 (11th Cir. 1993). Criminal depositions are authorized only when doing so is "necessary to achieve justice and may be done consistent with the defendant's constitutional rights." Id. at 1551. See Fed. R. Crim. P. 15(a).

The Supreme Court's decision in Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), reaffirmed the principle — developed at common law, and incorporated into the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment by the Framers — that testimonial statements may not be admitted against a defendant where the defendant has not had the opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. This is true even where the statements fall within a "firmly rooted hearsay exception" or bear "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness." Id. at 60. In Crawford, the Court noted that the Sixth Amendment was drafted in order to protect against the "civil-law mode of criminal procedure" and "its use of ex parte examinations as evidence against the accused." Id. at 50. Such ex parte examinations implicate Sixth Amendment concerns because they are "testimonial" in nature. The "text of the Confrontation Clause reflects this focus" and applies to "witnesses against the accused - in other words, those who bear testimony." Id. at 51 (internal quotations omitted). Although the Court declined to define "testimonial" evidence, they noted that an "accuser who makes a formal statement to government officers bears testimony in a sense that a person who makes a casual remark to an acquaintance does not." Id. The Confrontation Clause does not permit such testimonial statements to be admitted at trial against an accused without the "constitutionally prescribed method of determining reliability," i.e., confrontation. Id. at 62. In other words, "[w]here testimonial evidence is at issue . . . the Sixth Amendment demands . . . unavailability [of the declarant] and a prior opportunity for cross-examination." Id. at 68.

Despite Crawford's broad prohibition of testimonial statements at trial where the defendant has no opportunity to confront the witness, there are some situations in which depositions may be taken nonetheless. In these situations, the burden is on the moving party to establish exceptional circumstances justifying the taking of depositions. Drougal, 1 F.3d 1546 at 1552 (citing United States v. Fuentes-Galindo, 929 F.2d 1507, 1510 (10th Cir. 1991)). The trial court's discretion is generally guided by consideration of certain "critical factors," such as whether (1) the witness is unavailable to testify at trial; (2) injustice will result because testimony material to the movant's case will be absent; and (3) countervailing factors render taking the deposition unjust to the nonmoving party. Id. at 1552.

Here, because the material witness has not shown that any exceptional circumstances exist, her motion for videotape deposition should be denied. The conclusionary statement that "[h]er family is forced to suffer during her detention and she would like to return home", simply does not ring true and is irrelevant. See Declaration of Attorney Linda King attached to the motion. In this case it appears that the witness, Nuria Christina Ramirez, traveled from El Salvador to Mexico and then attempted to illegally enter the United States. When considering the issue, this Court must balance the interests of the Government and the accused, as well as the interests of the material witness. Although the material witnesses may have a liberty interest at stake, that interest is outweighed by Mr.Saavedra's constitutional rights of confrontation and to due process of law.[1]

The Confrontation Clause serves several purposes: "(1) ensuring that witnesses will testify under oath; (2) forcing witnesses to undergo cross-examination; and (3) permitting the jury to observe the demeanor of witnesses." United States v. Sines, 761 F.2d 1434, 1441 (9th Cir. 1985). It allows the accused to test the recollection and the conscience of a witness through cross-examination, and allows the jury to observe the process of cross-examination and make an assessment of the witness' credibility. Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 851 (1990); Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 63-64 (1980), overruled on other grounds by Crawford In a case such as the one at bar, where the material witness has received the benefit of the Government refraining from pressing criminal charges in return for her testimony against the accused,[2] it is important that the jury see the reaction and demeanor of the material witness when confronted with questions that will bring out such facts in order for the jury to decide whether to believe her statements and/or how much credit to give to her testimony. The jury's ability to make such an assessment would be compromised by a videotaped deposition because the tape may not preserve subtle reactions of the witness under cross-examination that may favor the accused.

[1] Moreover, to the extent that the material witness would provide testimony favorable to Mr. Saavedra (which is unknown at this point, since Mr. Saavedra has not yet interviewed any of the material witnesses), her release would violate Mr. Saavedra's Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process.

Moreover, the decision to grant video depositions is governed by Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 15(a), which states that a material witness's deposition may be taken only upon a showing of "exceptional circumstances." United States v. Omene, 143 F.3d 1167, 1170 (9th Cir. 1998). The material witnesses here argue that their continued incarceration constitutes an economic hardship for them and their family, and that this fact is sufficient to satisfy their burden of proof under Rule 15(a). See Torres-Ruiz v. United States District Court, 120 F.3d 933, 935-36 (9th Cir. 1997). This proffer and supporting declarations, however, are insufficient to establish extraordinary circumstances for several reasons.

To begin, almost any period of incarceration, by definition, will result in some sort of hardship to that individual and her family. Hardship alone cannot constitute extraordinary circumstances. Rather, the Court in Torres-Ruiz made clear that extraordinary circumstances require something more: "tremendous hardship." 120 F.3d at 936. In Torres-Ruiz, the material witnesses were both "the sole support for their respective families in Mexico." Id. at 935 (emphasis added). In this case, however, the material witness has not submitted a declaration establishing such tremendous hardship. Instead, in a general, seemingly boilerplate declaration by material witness counsel, it is simply alleged that the witness "would like to return home." There are no

[2] This Court should be mindful of the fact that the only reason the Government has not charged the material witness with a crime yet is that the Government seeks to introduce her testimony against the accused. The material witness could have been charged with illegal entry under 8 U.S.C. § 1325, which carries a maximum sentence of six (6) months imprisonment, depending upon the number of provable prior illegal entries into this country. Needless to say, the Government would not concern itself with the material witness' liberty interest had they, in fact, charged her with an offense. Indeed, unless counsel for this material witness has a written agreement from the government to the contrary, notwithstanding some quaint tradition in this district, nothing will prevent the later prosecution and imprisonment of the witness.

allegations that the material witness was the sole provider for her family or the sole caretaker of any family members. Obviously, the material witness in this case — no less than Mr. Saavedra — would want to be free to be at home with their families, but absent more tremendous hardship facts, mere sadness is simply not sufficient to establish extraordinary circumstances warranting deposition testimony.

Furthermore, this Court should consider the unique circumstances distinguishing the Ninth Circuit's decision in Torres-Ruiz. Unlike this case, in Torres-Ruiz the material witnesses' motion for videotape deposition was unopposed by the defendant. Id. at 934-35. Perhaps more importantly, in Torres-Ruiz the defendant entered a guilty plea less than two weeks after the motion for deposition was made, indicating that the case was already near disposition when the motion was made. Id. at 936-37. This case, however, stands in a much different procedural posture.

B. The Motion to Depose Material Witnesses Is Premature Because Mr. Saavedra Has Not Had Sufficient Time to Formulate a Theory of the Case, And the Witness Will Be Necessary Not Just for the Trial, But May Also be a Witness for Pretrial Evidentiary Hearings.

Mr. Saavedra has pled not guilty to all counts of the Indictment. Substantive motions have yet to be filed in this case — in fact, this motion is to be heard three weeks before the first motion hearing date. Defense counsel has not yet had an opportunity to interview any of the material witnesses, nor has any investigation been completed in this case. To require Mr. Saavedra to cross-examine the material witness at the current juncture of the proceedings would severely prejudice his future trial rights. Mr. Saavedra has been unable to discuss, much less formulate, a theory of the defense at this point. Without such formulation, any cross-examination of the material witness at this point would be at best meaningless, and at worst ineffective and potentially harmful to Mr. Saavedra and his defense.

The motion's prematurity is also evident because the material witness will likely be a necessary witness for pretrial evidentiary hearings, not just the trial. Although she has moved for a deposition to preserve her testimony for trial, and further requests release, the material witness may be a necessary defense witnesses for pretrial motions, particularly regarding the stop of the vehicle and the arrest of Mr. Saavedra. Because the material witness is a percipient witness — and, more importantly, non-government personnel witness — to the stop, her testimony is integral to the fair adjudication of Mr. Saavedra's case.

By its express language, Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 15(a) provides that "[a] party may move that a prospective witness be deposed in order to preserve testimony for trial." (Emphasis added). Title 18 U.S.C. § 3144 further provides that "[r]elease of a material witness may be delayed for a reasonable period of time until the deposition of the witness can be taken pursuant to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure." (Emphasis added). Put another way, these rules confer no right to move for a deposition where the material witness is relevant for a pretrial evidentiary hearing. Rather, these rules authorize the detention of a material witness, and more importantly, they preclude the release of the material witness at least until after any pretrial evidentiary hearings are concluded.

Because it is possible that the testimony of the material witness will support one or more of Mr. Saavedra's pretrial motions and may conflict with the testimony of the government's witnesses, credibility determinations and a fully-developed factual record will accordingly be key to the district judge's ruling on possible substantive motions. For example, the district judge may have further questions of the material witness that the parties fail to ask at the deposition. The judge will be able to ask the Customs and Border Protection agents these questions because they are present at the evidentiary hearing, but she will not be able to ask those questions of the material witness, who will be a defense witness. As a result, the record will be skewed — unfairly — in the favor of the Government. In other words, there is no assurance that the deposition will be sufficient to secure all of the necessary testimony by the material witness. Because substantive motions may well be dispositive of the case, a fully developed record — one that would allow the district court to examine the witness and view her demeanor — is necessary to guarantee Mr. Saavedra's right to due process. In short, the motion for a deposition and release of the material witness is premature and should — at the very least — be decided after there has been an evidentiary hearing on the motions in this matter.[3]

[3] If this Court orders the material witness released, she will be deported from the United States and would thus be outside of the subpoena power of the district judge. Obviously, this

C. The Motion for Deposition Should Be Dismissed Because There Has Been No Showing of the Unavailability of the Witnesses.

Finally, if the Court determines that the detention of the material witnesses must be reviewed at this point in time, the Court can easily resolve the issue by modifying the conditions of release for the material witness so that her continued detention would be unnecessary. Conditions of release for material witnesses are governed by 18 U.S.C. § 3142. Under this section, "[t]he judicial officer shall order the pretrial release of the person on personal recognizance, or upon execution of an unsecured personal appearance bond . . .unless the judicial officer determines that such release will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required . . . ." 18 U.S.C. § 3142(b) (2004) (emphasis added). Clearly, § 3142(b) suggests that this Court can order that the material witness be released on his own recognizance. The material witness has no incentive not to come back to court to testify. She is likely not going to be charged with a crime. The material witness has no incentive to flee the country. Indeed, if the statement of facts in support of the complaint in this case is to be believed, this material witness was prepared to pay money to be smuggled illegally into the United States. Therefore, she obviously wants to remain in this country, fully within the subpoena power of the Court.

Moreover, the Bail Reform Act states that "[t]he judicial officer may not impose a financial condition that results in the pretrial detention of the person." 18 U.S.C. § 3142(c)(2) (2004). This mandate, combined with the preference for release upon one's own recognizance, strongly suggests that the proper remedy for the material witnesses in this case is a motion to modify the terms of their release, not for the draconian remedy of immediately ordering a videotape deposition and deporting her to the El Salvador, especially not at this very early stage of the proceedings.

Because the deposition of material witnesses would violate Mr. Saavedras Sixth

Court cannot so interfere with the district judge's Article III powers by ordering the release of witnesses who are necessary for the adjudication of pretrial motions. Indeed, because this Court is empowered by Congress not by Article III of the Constitution, such a holding would run afoul of the separation of powers doctrine.

Amendment right to confrontation, would be inappropriately premature and would fail to meet underlying procedural requirements — including the unavailability of witnesses — the motion of the material witness should be denied.

III.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Mr. Saavedra respectfully requests that this Court deny the motion for videotaped depositions and voluntary deportation of the material witness Nuria Christina Ramirez.

Respectfully submitted,
